Technology leading the way

In the 19th century (1) seemed to many intellectuals that progress in science and technology would (2) slowly but surely to the promised land. As (3) as the economy was concerned, it was believed that (4) new technology, agricultural and industrial output would soar. With the (5) abundance of basic goods, it ought to be possible to satisfy everyone's needs for food, clothing and shelter. (6) was also the expectation that the demand for human labor would decline dramatically as machines did more and more (7) the work. Not only (8) people have all they needed, but they would also have ample time to enjoy it. Furthermore, if people no longer had to compete for scarce supplies, (9) there would be no excuse for social conflict and history would enter a glorious period of universal peace.

Obviously, the predictions of these optimistic social theorists did not (10) out to be very accurate. Where did they (11) wrong? One erroneous assumption was that people's (12) would always be fairly simple and easily satisfied. They didn't foresee the crafty way that advertising would be used to (13) people unhappy with what they had and always (14) of something better. These ever-growing needs are also the reason why the age of (15) has not yet dawned, since no one today could satisfy them (16) only working for one or two hours a day. New technology has (17) that basic goods like a loaf of bread and a tin of beans are cheaper than (18) before, but there is so much else that has to be paid for, and to pay for it, we must keep our long working days. As for peace, that has (19) to materialize because as economies keep trying to grow, there is an intensifying competition (20) limited resources.
